The True Test of Oysters.

"The best oyster experts that I know of," said the captain of an oyster boat, "judge an oyster by the smell instead of by the taste. There is something about the smell of any oyster that indicates its condition to me much plainer than does the taste. People buy them and eat them probably on account of their taste. So also do they buy tea, coffee and the various grades of whisky and brandy for their taste, but all experts on those things pass upon them entirely by their smell. The professional tea taster or whisky taster, so called, never tastes them, but simply arrives at their taste by their peculiarities of flavor or to speak plainly, smell. I can tell what price a load of oysters will be rated at when they arrive at the wharf here by opening up the hold of the boat and smelling. In eight cases out of ten I am right. It strikes oystermen as strange when they see persons going about from boat to boat, as they lie at the wharf, tasting oysters before they conclude to buy. Taste is all right, but if they don't smell right they will never taste right."—Washington Star.

The Snake's Bill.

The bill of the snake is provided with a nerve running down to the tip and then distributing itself over the end of the head. This is the only instance of this kind among birds and is a singular case of the care of nature in providing for her creatures. The snake seeks for his prey in mud and water, where he cannot see, and it is believed that the nerve advises him of the presence of food when his eyes give him no information.

A Stag and a Ladder.

Stories of deer with rain barrels or water pails on their heads are common enough among Maine and Adirondack guides, but it is left for Europe to come to the fore with a variant. Some hunters near Innsbruck came upon a stag with a ladder on its antlers. In spite of this handicap it made off at great speed on seeing the man, leaping hedges and dashing through the undergrowth as if quite unimpeded. Its mad career was stopped, however, when the ends of the ladder caught between two trees. Its struggles were so frantic at the approach of the huntsman's dog that it broke off part of its antlers and, thus freed, made good its escape. The ladder proved to belong to a farmer who had left it standing against one of his haystacks. While stealing the hay the stag had evidently upset the ladder, which had thus become fixed on its horns.

Thatched Roofs in England.

"The thatched roof, which makes the English cottage picturesque, is doomed," said an architect. "For some years it has been going gradually. Soon it will be altogether a thing of the past. Fire insurance is the cause of the thatched roof's disappearance. No company will insure a cottage or its contents if the roof is thatched. They who want insurance must substitute for the roof of thatch a tiled one. As long as the English cottager remains very poor so that his house and furniture are not worth insuring he keeps a thatched roof over his head. As soon as he begins to prosper and lays in household goods of value he takes out a fire policy and away then goes his thatched roof."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

BRIDE WAS NOT JEALOUS

Wanted to See All Her Husband's Former Sweethearts

THERE WERE NINE OF THEM

So He Invited Them All to a Dinner Party to Meet His Wife—They Came and No Hair Pulling Ensued.

Mr. and Mrs. Clayton N. Hume of Allegheny, Pa., were recently the host and hostess at what perhaps was the strangest banquet ever given. They entertained nine young women, all residents or former residents of Newcastle, Pa. Every one had been Hume's sweetheart.

There were no jealousies at the feast, and it was declared to have been one of the merriest events ever arranged. Hume lived in Newcastle when he was a boy and well on into his young manhood, and he was known throughout the city as one of the handsomest, jolliest young men in town. He was popular among his fellows and even more popular among the young women. It is admitted by Hume that between his twentieth and twenty-fourth summers he was on the verge of marrying nine of the prettiest girls in the district. His pathway through life was strewn with shattered engagements.

Early last January Hume's friends in Newcastle were astounded to receive cards announcing the approaching wedding of Clayton Nelson Hume to Miss Edith Berger. Those who didn't grin felt sorry for Miss Berger, whom they never had seen, and when the announcement cards telling that the wedding actually had taken place were received, all Hume's friends began to wonder who the bewitching, dazzling girl might be who finally had captured the young man.

Now, while all this curiosity about her was agitating Newcastle, the bride was having trouble with curiosity herself. In some way she got the idea that her husband had been in love many times, and she wanted to see his former sweethearts.

"I'll take you up to Newcastle some day and show 'em all to you," said her husband. But weeks passed and they did not go to the scene of Hume's earlier love affairs. Finally Hume agreed to take his bride to his old home on a certain day in the first week in June. He promised her that she should see and meet every one of his old flames, but said nothing to her of his plans. That night he sat down and wrote invitations to nine women, asking them to be his guests at a dinner to meet his bride. The invitations caused a sensation among the recipients, and when it was discovered that only the ones who either had been engaged to Hume, or had the chance to be, had been invited the sensation grew.

A meeting of the ex-sweethearts was called in Newcastle, and they laughingly agreed to attend the dinner.

The banquet hall was in the principal hotel in Newcastle, and Pittsburgh caterers furnished the dinner. Never in Newcastle was there such an array of gorgeous gowns. It is said that the nine guests were the nine most beautiful women in the city, and while they were removing their wraps they wondered among themselves how beautiful the bride must be.

The surprise of the evening was furnished for them—when they were introduced to the demure, quiet, brown-eyed little woman who stood timidly by Hume's side, looking frightened at all the array of beauty and style.

But during the dinner that followed the bride presided merrily and proudly. When they all had kissed her goodbye—"restored her husband's kisses to her," as they said—Mrs. Hume nudged up close to her husband and asked:

"Aren't you sorry you married me, Clayton?"

"Not on your life," said Clayton.

"Is she very lovely?"

"Ah! I can give you no idea how very lovely except that it is between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000."

STUDY FOR SCULPTORS.

Modern Discus Thrower Strikes a Graceful Attitude.

"If any of our sculptors are seeking for a new subject," remarked an artist who was sitting through a set of athletic games at which Martin J. Sheridan was giving an exhibition of his skill at throwing the discus, "there is the man for them to study. Just watch him the next time he throws the thing from my point of view and see if you don't think they would be rewarded for their study."

The spectator to whom this remark had been addressed kept his eye on the hero of the Greek games from the viewpoint of his sculptural possibilities, and this is the impression he received: A tall young man in a white, sleeveless jersey, running trunks and black spliced shoes stood quietly out in the middle of the field while a smart summer shower dampened his black hair until it was streaked down over his low forehead. His chest was unusually broad and deep, his shoulders square, the muscles of his legs having their greatest development in their long sinews rather than in circumference. His repose was the most striking thing about him, after his muscular development, for he rarely moved, talked little and laughed or smiled less. It was plain he took his work for the moment seriously.

Not when it came his time to throw the discus did he alter his manner, except to grow more intense, if anything. Grasping the circular disk of wood and metal, he made one preliminary and wide sweep of his body and arms, the movement being noticeably slow, and then as he gathered the necessary momentum he twirled with almost incredible speed twice around on his toes, the second revolution carrying upward until it seemed as if he must necessarily leave the ground and fly up into space, so full of the suggestion of flying was the tense, beautifully graceful figure.

As he rose on his toes in one of those revolutions of his body his figure had more grace than that of the classical "Discus Thrower" and suggested flying more than does Diana on her tower or the angel fluttering before Sherman as he marches to the sea.

Any sculptor who can create that effect in bronze is likely to be ranked among the masters of his kind and will do something far and away above the tinkling golf players or football warriors that so far represent the highest flights of our sculptors in works in the field of sport.—New York Press.

Our Railways.

The average number of passengers in each railroad train in the United States in 1904 was 50.25. This represents a growth from about 39 a train in 1898, but is still far below the development attained abroad. In 1898 Germany carried an average of 71 persons in each train, and India had the large figure of 189. The development of the electric railway in this country and the frequent train service help to keep down the average. On each of the 212,000 miles of railway in 1904 there were carried an average of 104,138 passengers. That is to say, the aggregate passenger mileage of the country, according to the Railway World, divided by the mileage of the track, gives the figure named. In Germany, as far back as 1898, this figure was 342,000 persons; in France it was 283,000 in 1907, in India 280,000 and in Austria 214,000. The figures for Great Britain are not obtainable.

Absinth in the Class Room.

An amazing discovery has been made in one of the communal schools of Paris. A class master noticed that after 10 o'clock every morning one of his pupils, a little boy of seven, seemed to become a prey to fits of delirium. He thumped his neighbors and when reproved by the master rolled on the floor shrieking and growling like one possessed. The child was constantly in the habit of asking leave of absence for a minute or two, and the master had him watched. It was found that he carried a small bottle of absinth in his pocket and took a sip as often as he could escape from the class room. It has been proved that the child's mother filled the bottle for him every morning.

A Deer and a Man.

In Westboro, Me., Percy M. Arnold saw a deer the other day. The animal allowed the man to approach it. Arnold threw his arms around the deer's neck. The deer sprang off toward the woods at great speed, and the man was afraid to let go. The deer rushed through bushes and over walls in its endeavor to shake off its strange burden. At last the deer brought up against a tree, and as Mr. Arnold had no wind left after meeting the tree he dropped off. Arnold will be forced to buy a new suit of clothes to replace the tattered rags which the bushes left him, when the doctor allows him out once more.

Bottle Making Machine.

Fourteen years ago a bottle manufacturer, Claude Bocher, in Cognac, France, was forced to close his factory by the continuous strikes and exactions of his employees. He then set to work to invent a machine for the manufacture of bottles. This machine he now in use in various parts of the country. One-quarter of a million bottles are turned out by it daily. A single machine produces 35,000 bottles in twenty-four hours, and any one can learn to run it in a week. The bottles are stronger and leak better than those made by the blowers.

Where Metal Does Not Rust.

Metal does not rust in Lake Titicaca, South America. A chain, an anchor or any article of iron, if thrown in this lake and allowed to remain for weeks or months, is as bright when taken up as when it came fresh from the foundry.
